It is indeed curious to note that the IOC at one point considered granting North Korea the staging of the table tennis tournament, a sport in which it was strong, and the canoeing event, simply because a river runs between the two Koreas. Chockfull of sometimes annoying but always informative bottom-of-the-page footnotes, this book is a worthy addition to most public library shelves. Park Chong Kyu, head of the Korean Olympic Committee, Ashwini Kumar, an Indian IOC negotiator, Kim Yu Sun, the North Korean member of the IOC, Samaranch, et al.

But faced with the prospect of the Games once again becoming the victim of boycotts and protests, the IOC took the uncharacteristically bold step of inserting itself fully into the arbitration between the two Koreas and their allies. . .

Five Rings over Korea: The Secret Negotiations Behind the 1988 Olympic Games in Seoul by Richard W Pound

In 1981, when the International Olympic Committee chose Seoul, South Korea, to be the site of the 1988 Summer Games, the decision was considered risky at best, potentially explosive, perhaps even fatal to the Olympic Movement. From Library Journal: Pound, a member of the International Olympic Committee IOC , presents a fascinating, in-depth look at the negotiations that brought the summer games to South Korea in 1988.
