To break this cycle, and better target investments, our proposal will require USDOT to conduct a broader study, with the support of state DOTs and impacted cities, identifying the communities with infrastructure that creates barriers to mobility such as highways that slice through a community and measuring the degree of harm to that community. Tourists were forced to walk around the Rainbow Center, the Wintergarden, and the Quality Inn all of which were adjacent, in total five blocks, discouraging small business in the city. As an outgrowth of these middle-class renovation efforts, a combination of private money and government matching grants—under a Department of Housing and Urban Development HUD program to rid the United States of the one hundred thousand worst public housing units—revived the blighted fifteen-hundred-unit St.

Others were aligned with or worked closely to cultivate the support of African American community leaders. Just counting families displaced, however, misses important dimensions of what made this so devastating.

Urban Renewal

Through the remainder of the twentieth century, urban renewal became more the responsibility of city and state governments and renewal activity declined significantly. A 1969 law that abolished minimum rents and stipulated that no family would have to pay more than 25 percent of its income to rent an apartment in public housing lacked federal subsidies to make up for the lost revenue.

How to Consign

City plans required approval from the Department of Housing and Urban Development before qualifying for funding. Even before , they had recommitted themselves to the area, and, in 1946, they joined other local interests to create the South Side Planning Board SSPB. Under the leadership of parks commissioner , City continued to construct new highways, expressways, bridges, tunnels, office buildings, and public housing and to force the migration and dispersal of residents and small businesses from working-class and poor neighborhoods.
