THE RETREAT FROM LONG ISLAND. On such occasions he was accompanied by only one servant, there being, as he thought, no danger of a surprise. I have met with no evidence that Washington, before noon, communicated his intentions to more than two persons on Long Island, namely, to Mifflin, through whom the order was sent to Heath, and to Colonel Joseph Trumbull, the commissary-general through whom a message was transmitted to Hugh Hughes, the acting quartermaster-general in New York.

A heavy cannonade at once commenced, which, however, accomplished nothing for either side as the distance was too great. Prince Ferdinand having moved his camp from Soltz nau to Petershagen, detached the hereditary prince on the twenty-eighth day of July to Lubeke, from whence he drove the enemy, and proceeding to Rimsel, was joined by major-general Dreves, who had retaken Osnabruck, and cleared all that neighbourhood of the enemy's parties: then he advanced towards Ilervorden, and fixed his quarters at Kirchlinneger, to hamper the enemy's convoys from Paderborn. .
