Aging

A cross-sectional study is one in which a researcher studies a number of people at different points in life at the same time.

Psychology and Aging

Such factors would serve to push an individual toward, and possibly to surpass, an individually defined threshold of overt behavioral deficits. While both systolic and diastolic blood pressures at contraction and dilation of the heart, respectively increase with age, the rate of systolic increase exceeds that of diastolic so that the pulse pressure widens.

Behavioral and Psychological Factors and Aging

How a couple views their past predicts their future: Predicting divorce from an oral history interview. The modern biosocial theory is interdisciplin.

How do people of different ages balance such situations — especially when important health consequences are at stake? For example, older adults with strong perceived control over memory function outperform older adults with weaker perceived control.
