Their aim was the same: to bring about a great revival of Talmud study in Western and particularly in German Jewry by a combination of what was best in the heritage of Lithuanian and German Jewry and especially by a synthesis of the cognate religious philosophies of Rabbi Yisrael Salanter and Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch.

Hirsch, Samson Raphael

While Hirsch was not unanimously praised in the far more conservative East European circles, there were many who looked very favorably to his ideas: In view of the mass defection from traditional practice and belief that made its way to Eastern Europe when Jews began to have more exposure to the general culture, there were many who saw the Hirschian model as the answer. He wrote a number of influential books, and for a number of years published the monthly journal Jeshurun, in which he outlined his philosophy of Judaism.
