I have been shocked to see Jancis Robinson's books and videos being slated by Americans. The story itself is a rather exciting one and takes the reader from Robinson's native London to the great winemaking houses of France, to the wine revolution in Mondavi's California to the established houses of Australia. I find some non-fiction to be very slow reads, if they're packed full of facts and not much dialogue.

She kind of rambles on about her life in a disjointed way that made it hard to follow the narrative of what she's talking about in a particular chapter. Robinson also writes a bit about her domestic life with her husband, former London restaurateur Nick Lander, and their three children. Some are food pairings while others are outside the box, pairing an emotion, place, or even a song lyric.

However, I was quite amazed that I remembered as much as I did about various wines and regions. I seriously use it to fall asleep at night.

Her BBC series about wine and her cadre of wine books were the basis for my early wine studies, and I continue to learn from her about far more than just vintage variation or fermentation techniques.

The book is divided into three categories: the place and sub-regions, the history, and the process of making Champagne.
