Farrell apparently assumes that by endless redundancy in the description of the surface of American Life, he will somehow write a book with the scope of Ulysses. However intensely it may be dramatized here and there, on the whole it must be presented as a conspectus, the angle of vision being assigned to the narrator.

It is a loss so great that the texture of the notation-like prose here suggests that the end is really all an illusion, that when Stephen tells us and himself that he is going forth to forge in the smithy of his soul the uncreated conscience of his race, we are to infer from the very quality of the icy, abstract void he now inhabits, the implausibility of his aim. When Marius takes a journey, visits a philosopher or enters a church, the event stands out of the past and makes THE STRATEGY OF POINT OF VIEW 27 an appeal to the eye, is presented as it takes place; and this is a movement in the direction of drama, even if it goes no further. Barrett, Eileen et Cramer, Patricia, eds.

Beach also brought out three volumes of his own poetry, Sonnets of the Head and Heart 1903, Beginning With Plato 1944, and Involuntary Witness 1950. It means that he keeps a certain hold upon the narrator as an object; the sentient character in the story, round whom it is grouped, is not utterly subjective, completely given over to the business of seeing and feeling on behalf of the reader.

Habit, that universal soporific, ordinarily conceals the passage of time from those who have gone their accustomed ways: at any one moment of time the changes are so minute as to be imperceptible.

Evidently he cannot be that, since the centre of vision is still within him; but by an easy sleight of hand the author gives him almost the value of an independent person, a man to whose words we may listen expectantly, a man whose mind is screened from us. Russell, Mark Schorer, Robert W. She closed her eyes; then she shivered at the touch of a hand on her sleeve; it was Felicity.

The dog began to cry then. And the final lesson of the modern novel is that technique is not the secondary thing that it seemed to Wells, some external machination, a mechanical affair, but a deep and primary operation; not only that technique contains intellectual and moral implications, but that it discovers them. It is necessary to show that in his attitude toward his European errand Strether is slowly turning upon himself and looking in another direction.
