Flexible working in Europe

Several studies investigated how these different forms of conflict relate to organizational outcomes.

Europe

When considering WFI as a mediator between parenting and pregnancy policies and work engagement, the availability of such policies become a significant predictor of higher work engagement, suggesting that such policies are perceived as important when perceptions of WFI are involved. Regarding the suitability of the length of follow up, drew attention to differences in the length of time required before changes to health outcomes might be observed.

Europe

For example, gradual or partial retirement relates to contractual flexibility whereas flexitime might be contractual but implicitly it offers choice and control regarding hours worked. First, the conclusions we draw from the present research are based on a relatively homogenous sample of Italian managers, which might affect the transcultural validity of our results. Interactions between gender and part-time work suggest that the positive productivity effect is driven by male part-timers working more than 25 hours, whereas the share of female part-timers is associated with wage penalties.
