The municipal borough includes the townships of Hyde, Godley, and Newton, and the suburb of Gee Cross, which is partly in Hyde township and partly in that of Wemeth. Clarke, was erected in 1832, at a cost of £4310, raised by parliamentary grant and local subscriptions; it is in the early English style, with a tower. The Act also transferred to the Committee the police powers of boroughs with a population of under 10,000.

The Clitheroe family seated at Salesbury had a considerable estate in the town from which they derived their surname, and it descended to the Talbots, although the monks of Whalley claimed to hold all the messuages and lands which had belonged to Sir Hugh de Clitheroe. Externally the extent of the old walling is plainly visible, including the angle buttresses, that on the north being set square and the southern one diagonally.
