To cite a few examples, in 1231 peasants at Setaka Estate in Chikugo did not pay their rice dues, eventuating a conflict sōron between the proprietor and land steward. Overall, the population of this random collection of thirteen provinces from the Kamakura era dropped by 14—59 percent, depending upon the method of calculation. With no reserves to tide over a hungry populace in the spring of 1257, the Shōga famine began claiming its victims in earnest. To be sure, decreases were particularly sharp over the late twelfth and thirteenth centuries, but given the peripheral status of these two provinces at the time, a sharply declining trend may not be unthinkable.

Japan's Medieval Population: Famine, Fertility, And Warfare in a Transformative Age

If kinship was still bilateral and there was no stem family or village community in the Kamakura era, then what held kinship groups together? Peasants in Iga protested to their proprietor Tōdaiji that while no area had escaped desolation, their estate exceeded even the worst case; since the cultivators had mostly starved to death or fled, they pleaded for a tax remittance. The famine of 1229—1232 provides one piece of the puzzle as to why population remained static for most of the thirteenth century. Second, historians often claim sizable expansion of the arable through land clearance for the Kamakura era.
