Policy - Social Work and People with Dementia: Partnerships, Practice and Persistence, Mary Marshall and Margaret

Description: -

Model or framework	Main ideas	Quality of intervention	Strengths	Limitations
Anti-oppressive practice	Identity is multiple and complex Oppression results when those in positions of privilege establish and sustain systems in which some have access to power and resources and others are marginalised	Recognise the evidence of oppression in its varied forms Work at individual and system levels to overcome oppressive relationships and ensure a just society	Attends to a number of dimensions that are possible sites of oppression, which provides a rich understanding of marginalisation Acknowledges the role of system-level inequalities that contribute to problems at the individual level	There is little research evidence linking anti-oppressive practice to positive outcomes for clients
Cultural competence	Practitioners require self-awareness, knowledge and particular skills to work effectively across difference	Deliver services at individual and organisational levels that are appropriate and responsive to the cultural concerns of diverse groups	Works to respond to needs of diverse populations Involves service users in planning and delivery of services	Ethnicity and culture are presented as static and fixed Views culture as something only people of colour or 'others' have Despite strengths of individual social workers, institutional barriers may prevent real change Lack of evidence linking cultural competence and positive health and mental health outcomes

Social Work and People with Dementia: Partnerships, Practice and Persistence, Mary Marshall and Margaret

Working with dementia: · looks at medical, social and citizenship approaches, thus providing the very latest thinking in the field; · covers a wide range of issues, including often-neglected areas such as sexuality and the design of the built environment; · provides contextual information about the old and new cultures of care; and · discusses skills such as communication and practical assistance. I particularly liked the chapter on communication which goes to the heart of creating partnerships with people with dementia and their families.
