Estimated prevalence rates of food insecurity during this 3-year period ranged from 6.

The severe economic costs of the US opioid crisis

The total number of employed workers was down 10 million, or over 7%, from the February peak. How vital was the swift shift to working at home during the COVID crisis? And retirement remains a significant issue: Even before the crisis, fewer than four in 10 nonretired adults thought their retirement was on track, with one-quarter of nonretired adults saying they have no retirement savings. Across the European countries surveyed, support for right-wing populist parties is related to ratings of the U.

United States Economic Snapshot

What the Pew survey shows is that most of the world still believes in the US, and sees it as holding on to the power and influence it wielded a decade ago.

Failed military interventions have driven widespread skepticism about the use of force. Some of those reasons, unfortunately, may actually reduce productivity. Those who hold favorable views of right-wing populist parties are more likely than those who hold unfavorable views to think the U.

U.S. Data and Statistics

The fall spike in COVID-19 cases requires additional closures and prevents many people from wanting to resume normal activities. The three questions were then combined into an index with designations for high social trust, comprising 27 percent of the electorate; medium social trust, with 38 percent of the electorate; and low social trust, with 35 percent of the electorate, that allow us to examine the demographic composition of each group and to explore any potential differences on foreign policy views across the groups. The president does not need congressional approval to remove or reduce tariffs imposed by the previous administration.
