Lord of Holderness, 1086

As a military defense and socio-economic paradigm designed to direct the wealth of the land to the king while it levied military troops to his causes, feudal society was ordered around relationships derived from the holding of land. When I have an opportunity to look at the book in the library, I'll check the additional comments. The female equivalent is baroness.

Brian especially cited the large Complete Peerage, but also contributed a number of on-line sources of information.

Anschetil the Dispensator

The American-Scandinavian Foundation, Volume V, 1929. Do you suppose that William of Friston was Sophia Haget's father and have any explanation of the names? In most cases, passing references in medieval royal and ecclesiastical records simply confirm the accuracy of the chronicle without adding significantly to our knowledge.

Review: ON THE VILLAGE GREEN on JSTOR

Often, barons hold their fief - their lands and income - directly from the monarch. Other Collections Scunthorpe Museum holds some small finds and an archive relating to the precinct.

He was of Cockfield, Durham, but rather than being named after the place, the place, was rather unusually, named after him. If the land of the William de Hedon mentioned previously by the same Stephen, can we at least look at the charters of Cecily de Rumilly to confirm my other finds. Vincent was a member of the Manorial Society of Great Britain and died in Douglas, Isle of Man, on 31 March 2018.

William Brito, the Steward of, seems connected to Outhorpe, Yorks and later becomes deputy Sheriff of Yorks.
