Besides the well-known to the operas especially the brilliantly energetic overture to Ruslan , his major orchestral works include the symphonic poem Kamarinskaya 1848 , based on Russian folk tunes, and two Spanish works, A Night in Madrid 1848, 1851 and Jota Aragonesa 1845. The only music he heard in his youthful confinement was the sounds of the village church bells and the folk songs of passing peasant choirs.

Musical culture arrived in Russia from Europe, and for the first time specifically Russian music began to appear, based on the European music culture, in Glinka's operas. There he reunited with his mother, and made the acquaintance of Maria Petrovna Ivanova. Glinka's compositions were an important influence on future Russian composers, notably the members of , who took Glinka's lead and produced a distinctive Russian style of music.
