Essays on the picturesque, as compared with the sublime and the beautiful; and, on the use of studying pictures, for the purpose of improving real landscape : Uvedale, Sir, 1747

Longinus argues for the latter as superior, and in setting up genius as being — if not without risk — a maverick and unruly force, seems to be at points quite ambivalent about whether the faults of a genius are rare instances of failure which are merely coincidental to its successes, or if its transgressions of correct form are an integral part of its power: Longinus writes at one point that all figurative language tends to excess 44 , at another that there should be no limit set on the number of metaphors in a passage 42 , and at another enigmatically that the failures and successes of writing come from the same source 9 .

Sublime visions of terror by Piranesi

In the UK, the descriptions of Hell in the early books of Paradise Lost which already appears as a mechanically animated landscape frequently formed the blueprint for descriptions of the industrial landscape. If we examine our feelings on a warm genial day, in a spot full of the softest beauties of nature, the fragrance of spring breathing around us, pleasure then seems to be our natural state; to be received, not sought after; it is the happiness of existing to sensations of delight only; we are unwilling to move, almost to think, and desire only to feel, to enjoy.
