'Upward

Chicago continues to be a living museum of the skyscraper, where the great architects of the world show their work. The Chrysler Building soon lost its crown to the Empire State Building, built during the Depression by a real estate developer, which reached a stunning 1,250 feet and 102 stories. The building reflected in its design the transition taking place in skyscraper design from load-bearing walls to steel frame construction.

Chicago History Museum, ICHi 21294 As the population density of urban areas has increased, so has the need for buildings that rise rather than spread. The district overlaps geographically with the neighborhood, originally the center of Chicago's printing and publishing industry, but now mostly converted to residential housing.

Monadnock Building

The skyscraper originally applied to buildings of 10 to 20 stories, but by the late 20th century the term was used to describe high-rise buildings of unusual height, generally greater than 40 or 50 stories. So tall and narrow a building must have some ornament in so conspicuous a situation.
