Mónica Espinosa Llorente, 2014

"The Columbus' most famous letter is a description of the first sighting of land on October 12, 1492. It is also known as the letter of discovery. In it, Columbus describes the first signs of land as he saw them. There is no clear reference to the day of the week or even to what night, see Crowley, see note, 1492." See Crowley, "The first update to Columbus' journal for Friday, October 12, 1492."

"We were so happy for the most important date to have his great discovery letters, so the world might know the importance of this day. We are very happy that he had accomplished what he performed himself with us."

"Columbus was granted with the title of 'Admiral of the Ocean Sea', the highest rank of his own culture... writing him a set of public dignities to give them official standing, orders from

Stephen Crowley

It was as if, in a moment, the world had birthed a new part of itself. This part of the world, which lied between continents and continents, had a long gestation. Yet, the parturition occurred with the birth of an era. Being born by Columbus ushered the new world into birth. The occurrence was legitimized by the birth certificate naturally drawn up by Columbus himself. But the birth was a final, the birth certificate unapologetic. It was not America that was born, but rather in violent grandeur, in myth of the discovery.

The discovery, the moment we all of a divine moment, has weight to cut and deny the sovereign existence of the Caribbean and the American mainland. More specifically, the myth of the discovery has sought to deny first existence prior to Columbus and prior to their inclusion in the original written record. David of Amerika's prior fragmentary existence earned a gap that was filled with ideological importunity. Narrative of discovery mythologized and fertilized
