Marshal Murat: King of Naples. In his despatch to Napoleon written at 22:00 he was still thought that most of the Prussian army was retreating north-east, although by then he realised that two Prussian corps were heading north towards Wavre. However, he made no move to recall D'Erlon when he could easily have done so.

The King of Prussia and the Russian Tsar, who were originally content with Murat were now indifferent to his fate because of the death of the unpopular Bourbon Queen Maria Carolina. After Waterloo, he allowed himself to be convinced by insurrectionists to attempt an attack on Calabria believing his supporters would triumphantly welcome him. The next day the Battle of Waterloo proved to be the decisive battle of the campaign.
