Here, there is genuine disagreement within the affected population about standards of beauty, the worth of sweet drinks, and how important these values are compared to health. At the same time, whether or how much group differences in aggregated natural measures of health matter morally is not necessarily obvious and may depend on the account of justice under consideration.

Public health also affects other things that matter morally to people, like respectful treatment, personal security or personal relations.

Public Health Ethics (Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy)

See Rawls 1971, and the entry on. The Nuffield Ladder is ultimately motivated by concerns about the appropriate scope of state activity, and how the rights or interests of citizens should restrict such activities.

International Encyclopedia of Public Health

Since the reason given in defense of the policy is incompatible with the motivational set of some individuals, it is not a public reason. If one person or at least, a sufficient number of such persons decides to go when the traffic light is red and stop when the traffic light is green, it does not matter that everyone else is following the rules: this person will disrupt the smooth functioning of the system, with potentially dangerous results. Reliance on average summary measures of things like income or education can also have implications for public health ethics.
