Siege warfare and engineering in Mount & Blade II: Bannerlord

After only four days, the Crusaders retreated in failure.

Medieval Warfare & Medieval arms

Since they were made tall to withstand an escalade, they presented excellent targets. If the diggers had to start in a place where the defenders could observe them, they needed a strong shed to protect them.

Ancient Engineering: The Art Of Siege Warfare

However, by 1560 every one of the essential elements was to be found in the work of a man like Francesco Paciotto da Urbino, who was responsible for the fortification of Turin. Against stone fortifications, they worked best when battering corners. Towns and cities could also field militias.

Siege Warfare

For example the Greeks and Romans had used iron ties to join blocks of stone together. Most armies contained significant numbers of spearmen, archers and other unmounted soldiers. Equally, they meant that more men could be put on the walls in a shorter period of time, as simple ladders constrained the men attacking to moving up in single file, thus making the task of defending the walls far easier.
