It regulates that an employer must give the same salary to the workers who do the same work. Of course, children in poor countries deserve protection and education too, but the standard of protection and the resources available for schooling will be far below those in a wealthy country. Following this line of reasoning, poorer countries have a better chance at abolishing child labour through economic development rather than minimum age requirements.

Second, how can labor standards, once negotiated, be enforced? Once the standard is adopted, all member States, in accordance with , are required to bring the Convention and the Recommendation to the attention of their competent national authorities usually the parliament for considering relevant legislation or other measures. The ILO condemns both child labor and hazardous work with the goal of eliminating hazardous child labor by 2016. If we insist that the resulting compensation package meet minimum international standards, we are substituting our own judgment for that of the affected workers and their employers.
