Goals

Linguistics and Language Learn An introduction to the study of language with an emphasis on language as a human system, including language acquisition, the cognitive and social significance of language, language change and variation, phonology, morphology, syntax, semantics, discourse analysis, historical linguistics, and psycholinguistics. Representing Civil Rights This course will focus on literary, cultural, and historical texts that depict particular historical periods or events and their core issues, such as the 1920s, the American Civil Rights Movement, or the Victorian Age, as a means of understanding how literature treats historical and political issues such as rights, politics, ethics, identity, and historical recovery.

English

It is a way that the author uses words to mean more than 1 thing. A personal book to help someone through their journey? Choose the point of view of the narrator.

Introduction to Fiction Writing

By connecting major-specific skills to the larger demands of contemporary workplaces and civic life, this class enables students to consider their post-college goals in relation to broader questions about the position of the humanities in 21st century society. Prerequisite: ENSC 201 and COMM 101 or permission of the instructor. Symbolism is easier to spot the second time you watch or read a story, when you are already aware of the general events of the story and can focus on the underlying meaning.
