Kim Kardashian Wears Shipwreck

But the most impressive piece was a damask gown with a high collar and ruffled sleeves—the kind of thing noblewomen or royalty might wear around the house. As well as being beautiful, silk must be the most amazing material to survive hundreds of years! I read a short news story about this yesterday evening and was hoping you would mention it here.

Many wrecks are protected by the sand, but as currents shift they can be exposed to the more damaging elements of sea. Among the items is a beautiful silken gown that likely belonged to royalty.

Exquisitely Preserved 17th Century Dress Recovered From Shipwreck

The gown is astonishingly well-preserved, given the circumstances, and may be one of the ever brought up from the sea floor. Accessorizing with 25-carat nude diamond drop earrings and a 15-carat nude pear-shape diamond ring from Lorraine Schwartz, the 39-year-old reality star donned a shipwreck-inspired oyster dress from. When they took a closer look, they spotted a package buried in the sand.

Divers also recovered luxury items like fine wood, materials used for varnish and crates that may have once held expensive spices, Laskow reports. It was only when they brought the bundle to the surface that they realized. Archaeologists from the Kaap Skil Museum in Holland have been analyzing the contents ever since.

Exquisitely Preserved 17th Century Dress Recovered From Shipwreck

While 17th-century paintings give historians a good idea of how nobles dressed when they wanted to look their best, evidence of their everyday lives is much rarer. The gown and other treasures are on Texel. The neck has an upright collar.
