Trade liberalisation in small open economies : the case of Kenya

Plant level productivities are estimated for the 1983—1996 period following the procedure of Olley and Pakes. One does not need to estimate all structural parameters of the model to estimate the welfare effect of an arbitrary tariff change.

Economists' changing perceptions of government

This combination of support and protection hurts Brazil's relatively low cost exporters, who lose out to higher-cost Caribbean producers because of the tariff-rate quota allocations enjoyed by the latter. On average, countries experience losses of 2.

Import Restrictions

Performance of Manufacturing Firms in Kenya: Parastatals vs. OECD tariff peaks affect 27 percent of total tariff lines on textiles and clothing, while the trade-weighted average applied tariff in developing countries is 16 percent. This may explain why only 60% of PTAs in 2011 addressed any standards.

And they help net out the effects of countervailing forces, such as trade diversion and trade creation. The results of our model show that the gains from trade liberalisation, in terms of the growth of real GDP, are low. With the benefits of liberalization come a number of risks and adjustment needs.
