In pit graves it is not uncommon to find some bowls positioned upside down while others have been stacked the right way up, suggesting that no food or liquids were put in the vessels at the time of burial.

The Koryō upper classes seem to have also desired wares that looked different from those made on the Korean peninsula, resulting in the import of wares from the Ding, Cizhou, and other kilns in China, especially during the tenth and eleventh centuries, before the local production of celadon reached maturity. Most pit graves contain no objects, but some have yielded celadon ceramics and unglazed stonewares as well as different kinds of metalwares, usually bronze spoons, hairpins, and occasionally mirrors.

By the 1420s Confucian scholars were arguing that the Jia li should be the exclusive manual for funeral and mourning rites, resulting in significantly different ways of dealing with the dead. For example, introduced high-end fashion labels such as Givenchy and Balmain to the Korean audience.

Most porcelain myōnggi have rough forms and plain, undecorated surfaces fig. Some are simply labeled Koryō. Most common are those with a curved handle that splits into a jagged fishtail design.

Fashion in Korea

It is not known whether kilns produced ceramics that were used solely as burial goods. An epitaph inscription from the mid-twelfth century testifies that in some cases they were used for cremated remains, but in other cases they may have been used to store defleshed bones. For example, while artifacts made of precious metals like gold and silver have been found in stone chamber tombs, they are seldom recovered from pit graves.
