case for reindustrialisation in developing countries: towards the connection between the macroeconomic regime and the industrial policy in Brazil

This finding is again in agreement with the finding of Paydarfar et al.

Import substitution industrialization

This chapter then sets the stage for the later chapters, which deal systematically with different post-1960s approaches: Marxism, humanism, realism, structuration and postmodernism. To achieve that, some newly-independent states pursued to build indigenous growth and break free from capitalist development patterns.

New jobs for old? Reindustrialisation policies in Derwentside in the 1980s

While the investment to produce cheap consumer products may be profitable in small markets, the same cannot be said for capital-intensive industries, such as automobiles and heavy machinery, which depend on larger markets to survive. It was an inward-looking economic theory practiced by developing nations after.
