I would say this is definitely a potential danger. The Royal Military College of Science warned in 1970 that if there was an explosion on the wreck, the force would create a 3,000 metre-high column of water and a five metre-high tidal wave would swamp Sheerness and its 11,000 residents before travelling up the Thames. The mast removal is needed to ensure the wreck remains as stable as possible by taking the weight of the masts off the ship and allowing it to continue to degrade naturally underwater.
