 The NEW WORLD BANK PLANNING PARADIGM
 Before taking many recent developments in mind it is useful to remember what the Bank has been doing since the mid-1970s. In those years, the Bank's approach to development planning was characterized by a focus on the role of the state in the economy, with an emphasis on industrialization and import substitution. This approach was based on the assumption that economic growth could be achieved through state-led planning and investment in heavy industry, agriculture, and infrastructure. This approach was later abandoned in favor of a more market-oriented approach, known as "structural adjustment," which emphasized privatization, deregulation, and free-market competition. This shift in approach was driven by a desire to align the Bank's work with the goals of the World Bank's shareholders, particularly the United States and other developed countries, who were pushing for a more liberalized global economy.
