The swallow senses the wind and the rain The cicada sees the darkening leaves, takes flight again I gaze homewards but dread the evening The later it is, the more hazardous the mountain paths. The wandering oriole soars up and down its bumpy path Over wayward currents, it crisscrosses, as if buffeted by chance What ingenious warbling, how could there not be beauty within? At seventy, I could follow what my heart desired, without transgressing what was right.
