In the , similar freedom suits were rejected by the courts, who issued statements which said that the rights in the state constitutions did not apply to. But many new manors were created after the conquest, and an Act of Parliament, the 18th of Edward I, 1290, was passed to put a stop to this practice. And that portion of this manor which was set aside for charitable purposes, was intrusted to the charitable care, of St.

Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2012. Whether it was done as an act of kindness to the tenants, as a compensation for the loss of the public watering places which existed on several parts of this estate, or to increase the value of the estate matters little to our purpose: but we cannot suppose that a public Company would have consented to this clause without some adequate consideration; and even if the value of this consideration is no longer felt, which I believe is not the case, that is no reason why their obligation should not remain.
