Abstract: This study is one of the few recent studies to examine how crime is related to social interaction between people. Disaggregating the homicide data based on victim-offender relationship one provides additional information that has not been overlooked. This study examined the relationships among the victim-offender relationship, sex, race/ethnicity, gender, and sex and race/ethnicity interactions among the juvenile homicide offenders. The results indicated that the sex and race/ethnicity interactions in the Chi Square were also significant in the logistic regression model using single variable, gender, race, marital status, ethnicity, and race and sex as statistically significant. Homicide offenders who were female and black or African American were more likely to be implemented and innovation strategies for types of homicide.

Introduction

Homicide is the most serious crime known. It is usually caused by severe economic, religious, and social problems. A common misconception is that homicide occurs in a homogeneous group and studies focused on characteristics of the victim, the source of the victim's support, and the social context of the victim. However, there is little research that could contribute to this aspect. However, one of the first suggestions to comprehend homicide by Hirschman et al. (1990) was that homicide is a social problem (Hirschman, 1990, 1995). From his classic study, "Patterns in Criminal Homicide," he found that homicides seemed to occur in a social context. He suggested that homicide offenders had close relationships with relatives and friends. He therefore suggested that homicides should not be treated as a homogeneous group and the attempts to disaggregate homicide would provide additional Wallace 1986 reported that the common theme running through other family homicides and particularly in-law killings, was marital conflict and marital violence: The domestic dispute had spread to include other members of the family who adopted a protective role of the abused spouse, the wife. Again, however, community-level variations in what may be responses to violence are often simply used as causal predictors of violence. As with other types of family homicide, a domestic argument was the most prevalent motive, although to a lesser extent 23 per cent.

Reconstructing homicide events: The role of witnesses in fatal encounters

Victim Resistance In a related manner, situational analyses have studied the role that victim resistance plays in the outcome of violent events. Examples of informal social control include neighbors' taking note of or questioning strangers, watching over each others' property, assuming responsibility for supervision of general youth activities etc. We should thus recognize that simple interpretation of the link between urban social structure and violence is not possible.

Violent Victimization and Offending: Individual

There are several theories of victimology that study the relationship between the victim and the offender. Hindelang 1978 has investigated the extent to which black over-representation in official data is due to differential involvement in violent crime or to differential selection into the criminal justice system via arrests by police.
