Instead, it affects how we learn a. Our daily encounter with the environment is a form of socialization that is defined as the process of integrating within oneself a sense of connection to a larger social world by means of discovering, understanding and adopting the beliefs, values, and norms of culture of other people.

Adult Development & Aging — Publications

Individuals in need of care at particular times may include adult children with special needs, aging parents, a sick family member or a friend. It emphasizes the applied nature of the biopsychosocial perspective. In addition the chapter about person-environment interactions would facilitate explaining aspects of aging relevant to this area that can be difficult to convey to undergraduates because of their complexity.
