Many countries implemented freezes on recruitment see , column 5.

Health Policy Reform in Sub

Redeployment within the civil service, decentralization, and contracting out With the decision to switch from a policy of state intervention to one where private sector ownership is promoted, there was an urgent need for a fundamental review of the functions of the civil service. The number of ghosts identified was usually substantial: for example, in Uganda and Ghana the equivalent of 8 percent and 4 percent respectively of the total civil service were identified. This had the effect of widening the measured differentials between lower- and upper-grade base salaries, since usually only higher-grade staff were eligible for nonwage benefits.

Also, only in a few cases were some embassies closed e. Laying off such employees is facilitated by the fact that they do not have accumulated retirement and other service-related benefits. Since salary decompression has not been widespread, there is an urgent need to introduce differentiated real wage changes, with increases in favor of those in the higher grades, especially those in professions who quit because private sector wages are higher.

Determinants of Trade Policy Reform in Sub-Saharan Africa

Adjustment in Employment Limited employment data prevent a full analysis for all countries: only 19 countries have continuous time series covering 1990-96, with the quality and comparability requiring these data to be treated with considerable caution.

Management and health care reform in sub

There is a need to consolidate quantitative first-generation reforms that contribute to macroeconomic stabilization.
