Mandarin Chinese zhishi (similar to English 'only'), comprised of the adverbial prefix zhi and the copular verb shi, is an affective marker (ADM), a discourse mode (DM). This study aims at the analysis of its pragmatic functions based on the methodological and theoretical principles of interactional linguistics and conversation analysis. The results show that the pragmatic functions of zhishi are closely related to the frequently occurring daily conversations: 1) radial TV interviews and 3) TV panel discussions. The results also show that the pragmatic functions of zhishi are closely associated with ADMs and DMs. In addition, the present data show that since zhishi is often used in turn-taking situations, it is closely related to the speech act of informing (i.e. language indicating that an utterance conveys the speaker's expertise). The findings also show that the pragmatic functions of zhishi are closely related to the speech act of informing. The pragmatic functions of zhishi depend on turn-taking systems and speech situations in spoken discourse. Specifically, the ADMs that occur in radial TV interviews and TV panel discussions, while the DMs that occur in casual conversations.
